A LAND OF OLD REOWN.

thoroly substantial, practical people, yet a people not wholly indifferent to the relaxations of life, for we know that they have the frequent feasting, their barbs, and dramas which were enacted before the sovereign and his court.

The traditions of the Incas were handed down from generation to generation by the wise men, who taught them in the schools of Quito, and statistics and records were also preserved by means of the knotted cords. But this is poor material for history building. In the absence of all written documents the study of their monuments becomes of the greatest importance in studying their civilization. These ruins show us what they did in architecture; their reservoirs and aqueducts give us an insight into their system of agriculture; their bridges and roads show us that they had much communication with each other; their fortresses and other public works show a numerous and flourishing population, besides, of course, showing material progress. These monuments also throw much light on their customs, modes of life, political, social and domestic organizations. The remains of their elaborate prisons indicate plainly how they punished crime, and from the ruins of their cities we can see how closely the people must have been crowded together in their narrow homes. We know the general character of their household implements and the material of which their clothing was made; the tombs give us evidence that they believed in a future life. From the monuments, therefore, of this remarkable people whose empire, with its advanced civilization, was destroyed by the Spanish conquest, we are able to get a fairly full record of their history, and it is to be hoped that future research and investigation may fill in the now imperfect outlines.

Pizarro, the Conquistador.

The discoverer and principal hero in the conquest of Peru was Francisco Pizarro, the illegitimate son of Gonzalo Pizarro, and a man of a daring, adventurous spirit. The news of the New World filled him with wild dreams of power, and in 1526 he and two other Spaniards, true conquistadores, made a compact to conquer and divide equally among themselves the great still undiscovered Southern Empire. Pizarro and one of these, Almagro, started with a force of 160 men from Panama, he loved his country and sought its welfare according to his best. The second was of pure Basque descent, and joined the patriot army before he was 15. He wrote political poems which were immensely popular, but seizing the supreme power, he perished under a twisted and unjust sentence in 1536. Santa Cruz was of pure Inca descent, and very proud of it, his mother having belonged to an Inca family of high rank. Tho not a very successful general, he possessed abilities of an administrative character, and was of much service to his country.

One of the best Presidents Peru ever had was Don Manuel Pardo, an honest and enlightened statesman, who did much to improve its impoverished condition, regulated Chinese immigration to the coast valleys, advanced education and encouraged literature. Peru's last war was with Chile, which resulted in the loss of her valuable nitrate fields, and which threw her back many years.

The climate of the coast region of Peru is a perpetual, mild and agreeable Spring, perfectly healthy. In the highlands the region between the mountain chains, which is about 8,000 feet above sea level, the climate is cool and dry. Although the soil is not very fertile here, corn, wheat, barley and other cereals are largely cultivated. The potato, indigenous to the soil of Peru, is here produced in abundance. These highlands are also the grazing lands of Peru, and large numbers of cattle are raised there. The breeding of sheep is developing rapidly, and the amount of wool exported increases yearly. The llamas, alpacas and vicuñas, found exclusively in Peru and Bolivia, whose wool is highly appreciated in foreign markets, can be found in large herds in this part of the country. All over this mountainous region lie the gold, silver, copper, lead, antimony and coal mines, many of the veins being of extraordinary size and uniform consistency.

From the eastern slopes of the Andes to the boundaries of Peru and Brazil extends the forest region, which is in parts very dense, and intersected by streams which flow into the Amazon, the largest river in the world, with its 12 tributaries, each 1,000 miles in length. The rainfall of this section is almost inconceivable and beyond description. Vegetation is most luxuriant and vigorous. The flora is wonderful and beautiful. Ferns of all kinds and exquisite flowers mingle their beauty with the reckless prodigality of production. Here also are found a variety of plants used for medical, dyeing and tanning purposes. India rubber of the finest quality grows here, and here also are located the best lands on which to grow the famous coca, from which cocaine is obtained. At present this part of the country is thinly populated, and parts of it still uncultured.

The Population.
The population of Peru is about 4,000,000, of which the Capital, Lima, has 150,000. It has about 1,500 miles of public railroads. All foreigners are welcomed to the country, given all the privileges which the native enjoys, are free to take up any business or profession they choose, and are protected in every way by the Government. After a residence of two years they can take out naturalization papers, and provided they have a regular profession or trade, can belong to the municipal body and other official institutions. They cannot, however, serve in the Congress, become Minister of State or President of the Republic. All foreigners have the right to buy lands and to work mines and rubber lands under the most favorable conditions. Elementary education is free, and municipal schools exist in all the towns and villages of importance. All foreigners are at liberty to avail themselves of the schools, and no difference is made between the native and foreign children.

Peru is not a manufacturing country, but she possesses all the natural resources which properly developed would put her well to the front of the industrial countries of the world. She has lately enjoyed an 18-year period of peace, and has during these years made marked progress in industry and commerce. For the first time since the independence of Peru its treasury shows a surplus. Her foreign trade is increasing, and her trade with us. Recent enterprises, some of them representing American capital, look very promising, and with the opening of the Panama Canal will probably come greatly increased trade relations between the Republic of Peru and the United States.

Peru's Representative in America.
Peru is represented in this country by Senor Pardo, and in the attractive room of his residence on Connecticut street, he is the staff of the National Tribune was most cordially received and given much interesting information concerning his country. The minister belongs to the old aristocratic and aristocratic families of Peru, his father having occupied the high office of President, and the present Executive, Dr. D. Jose Pardo, being his uncle. Senor Pardo is a man of noble fortune, and has lived a life of leisure, untrammelled by business cares and anxieties, has traveled much and resided in Europe about 17 years. Senor Pardo is a man of noble fortune, and has lived a life of leisure, untrammelled by business cares and anxieties, has traveled much and resided in Europe about 17 years. Senor Pardo is a man of noble fortune, and has lived a life of leisure, untrammelled by business cares and anxieties, has traveled much and resided in Europe about 17 years.

Senor Pardo spoke modestly of Peru's plans for honoring it when it should visit Callao, and of the pleasure it would afford his people to give some substantial proof of the sincerity of their friendly intentions.

Financial Condition Growing Better.
Altho Peru, once the synonym for fabulous wealth, has suffered much financially since her war of independence, and especially so in her recent war with Chile, which depredated her principal source of national wealth, her valuable nitrate fields, yet Senor Pardo feels that the present situation is full of hope. For the past 18 years the country has been under the rule of wars of revolutions, and for the past 10 years marked progress has been made along many lines.

During this period of order, honest and able administration, many of the pernicious traditions have been rooted out, and into the lower classes have been instilled the principles of democracy, liberty and the dignity of labor. The people are more intelligent, and the progress made by Peru, and answered many questions put to him by the National Tribune representative with evident pleasure and intelligence. The first railway built in Peru, which, if not the first in South America was certainly the second, was constructed in 1851. These are the roads built by the State, and this means to the people can hardly be conceived, as the hilly character of the country requires a great deal of work and communication was therefore greatly restricted. Two important Transandinian railways have already been constructed, and a third, which will open Peru to the sea, is now under consideration. This immense valley of the Amazon, which still preserves intact its wonderful natural wealth, and which is almost uninhabited, will thus be opened to civilization.

One of these roads now in operation, called the Central, starts from Callao and runs to Cerro de Pasco, 15,000 feet above sea level, in about 10 hours. The rapid change from a low to high altitude produces a derangement of the heart called "soroche," which is not, however, generally fatal, and is overcome by a period of rest. The water that comes out of the engines at this point is boiling hot. If you wish to boil an egg it takes about 12 minutes. The climate in this part of Peru is rapid change from day to night and scorching at noon.

This is a great mining district. The rich and abundant copper deposits are found here, as well as a peculiar kind of silver. These mines are being largely worked by an American syndicate under the name of the "Serra de Pasco Mining Co." Nature has been generous to Peru in the way of mineral richness; in fact, it would be difficult to name the mineral not to be found in Peruvian territory. While there are large beds of coal, they have not been worked long, but this industry is destined to acquire a vast importance in the future. The quality of the coal, however, cannot be compared to that of the English beds, being too soft.

A Great Petroleum Region.
Peru possesses an immense amount of petroleum, and it is believed that in Tumbes, and new beds have recently been discovered in the south. A large amount of American capital is invested in Peru, almost entirely in oil mines. This naturally brings in a large American colony, which is made welcome as a member of a large family, and given all the advantage which the country affords, both a business and social way. Immigration is greatly desired by Peru, and it is singularly believed that the opening of the Panama canal will add largely to its foreign population. The accessibility of the great Amazon district is also expected to attract those from other lands. Among the Europeans who have come to Peru have been many more desirable than the Italians, who have, however, soon removed themselves from the laboring class by becoming frequently during their second visit, clearly why they came so quickly and thoroughly.
